I've got a SVN repository on my server, and I want to download the latest modifications to that folder. Now, I have Tortoise SVN 1.5.4 installed on Windows. Here's the scenario: I have modified some files in that repository, and committed them. I have pulled those changes from the repository and made some modifications to those files in my own working copy. I tried to just update the files I had already modified, but it didn't seem to work. It only did it after I deleted my local files, and then committed changes to the server. In this case, the change was the filename of those files, and the commit was "First modification to revision, tag, etc.", but it was not the latest revision. Is there any way to make Tortoise SVN automatically update the files in the working copy to the latest change? A: If you want to update your Working Copy to latest you need to commit the changes first. If you re-opened the dialog for resolving conflicts, and then try to commit, TortoiseSVN will update your Working Copy, using the latest changed files. You should also consider using Subversion Import/Export for more flexible import/export options, and to avoid manually resolving conflicts. Predictive validation of the French matrix testing battery for the diagnosis of tinnitus. The French matrix testing battery (FTB) is a new clinical test to assess the tinnitus symptoms. The aim of this study was to validate this test in the context of a large series of patients with different tinnitus. To test the test reliability and the test-retest repeatability, four experts scored independently the FTB before and after a month's time. To assess the convergent validity, the FTB
